There never has been a time when people were as free of dress in any style that pleased them as now. The neglige fashion of the summer resort has been brought to town, and the loose garments necessary for the free movement of tennis-players must be responsible for it pear on Washington street in colored shoes, a scant straight skirt, a flannel blouse and cap, and a young man in a corresponding dress. Their appearance creates no great sensation, unless there is something unusually conspicuous in color or exceedingly ultra in style. The wearer thus may follow the make-up that pleases the fancy, and does not have to confine himself or herself to dull tailor-made suits for the streets a la mode dictated only a few years ago.
